CONFEDERATE EARTHEN FORT

At the beginning of the Civil War in 1861, the Confederate Army chose Rainbow Banks in Martin County as a site for fortifications. These fortifications provided the upper Roanoke Valley with badly need protection against the Union gunboats that were beginning to enter eastern North Carolina's rivers and sounds. The 100-foot clay bluffs at the area of the river gave the Confederates a clear view of the river in both directions, and their vantage point was too high for the guns on the Union boats to reach. In addition to protecting the citizens of the area, the fort protected "The Lifeline of the Confederacy" – a railroad bridge at Weldon that helped to supply General Lee's army with provisions – and the building site of an ironclad vessel, the C.S.S. Albemarle, just above Hamilton.

FORT BRANCH TODAY...

The Fort Branch Battlefield Commission is working to preserve and restore the Fort and its heritage. The First North Carolina Volunteers, a Civil War re-enactment group, uses Fort Branch for their winter headquarters and battle drills.

In 1987, the First Annual Battle Re-enactment was held at Fort Branch. A battle re-enactment is held annually at the Fort the first weekend in November offering a unique "Living History Program" to visitors. Other special events at the Fort usually include a Civil War Christmas the first Saturday in December and a Spring Living History Program.

On display at Fort Branch are eight of twelve original cannons, and the restored late 1800's steam engine from the "Ranger". Local Indian pottery and artifacts from Hoggtown, an Eighteen Century river community, can also be seen. The reconstructed winter quarters of the 1st N.C. Volunteers are also open for public viewing. Additional displays, such as rebuilt gun emplacements and the restoration of an 1850's farmhouse.
